Big Five receives reports from Cairo's Tahrir Square

Stuart, FL (July 9, 2013) – Egypt is once again making history; and we are once again witnesses. Big Five is receiving ongoing first-hand accounts from the family of its managing director in Egypt, Gamal Abu Seif. Both his daughters, Farah and Nour Abouseif, have been reporting from Cairo's Tahrir Square regularly as millions of Egyptians take to the streets in protest of the Muslim Brotherhood and President Mohammad Morsi's rule.

"With so many conflicting stories flying around right now, we wanted to provide a window into what is happening through detailed reports from the ground, and without taking anything out of context," said Ashish Sanghrajka, president of Big Five Tours & Expeditions.

The widespread demonstrations that began in June spread beyond Tahrir Square and involved more than 25 million Egyptians, and is believed to have been the largest peaceful demonstration in world history, according to CNN News.

Egyptians protested against the Muslim Brotherhood and Mohammad Morsi's rule since November 2012. Most Egyptians came to believe that the president they elected was not the answer for which they had hoped and voted.

Following President Mohammed Morsi removal from office by the Egyptian military, the mood of the country seems optimistic.

Abouseif emphasizes that the military took action to help Egypt, not rule it. What Abouseif and many other Egyptians want to see includes an end to any escalation of violence, early presidential elections; and the creation of a national coalition government that represents all Egyptians equally.

"I hope people recognize that what is happening in Egypt right now will change the course of the country. I strongly believe this had to happen and that Egypt, in the long run, will be better, stronger and more democratic because of it," stated Sanghrajka.
